Chapter 130: The Inner Worlds of the Sixth and Seventh Clones

As the sixth and seventh clones of Sung Jin-Woo settled into their respective domains, each aware of the immense responsibility they bore, they began the process of further consolidating their power. In order to strengthen their reach and solidify their control over the realms they protected, each clone created their own inner world—a sanctuary of unparalleled magnitude where time flowed differently and power could be honed without limit.

These inner worlds were more than just pockets of reality; they were sanctuaries where the clones could meditate, cultivate their strength, and foster the growth of their emissaries, who would serve as their trusted lieutenants in their domains.

The Sixth Clone’s Inner World

In the domain of the Heavenly Soldiers, the sixth clone created an inner world, a vast and ethereal realm that reflected the purity of light and divine order. The inner world was a space where the passage of time was distorted, and the flow of power could be amplified.

Time Flow: Within this inner world, time flowed differently. One second in the outer world equaled a full year within, allowing the sixth clone to cultivate untold power and refine their strategies at an accelerated pace.

Environment: The inner world was bathed in eternal light, with landscapes of radiant fields, towering crystalline structures, and heavens filled with glowing stars. It was a place of serenity, yet beneath the surface lay immense power waiting to be unleashed.

Creation of the Emissary: The sixth clone’s emissary, birthed within this inner world, was shaped from the purest essence of divine energy. This emissary served as both a mirror of the clone's will and an extension of its power. Imbued with divine authority, the emissary was tasked with ensuring the harmony of the Heavenly Soldiers, guiding them in their endless crusades for balance and order.

The emissary, while carrying a fraction of the clone’s power, was formidable in its own right. Through its influence, the emissary could summon and command legions of Heavenly Soldiers, ensuring their loyalty and strength.

The Seventh Clone’s Inner World

In the Nocturne Abyss, the seventh clone’s inner world was a reflection of the chaotic and destructive nature of the Dark Apostles. This inner world mirrored the vast, ever-shifting void of entropy but had a twisted beauty of its own.

Time Flow: Like the sixth clone’s inner world, time moved at an accelerated rate in the seventh clone's domain. One second outside was equivalent to one year within, granting the seventh clone the opportunity to cultivate its power in isolation from the outer realms.

Environment: The inner world was an endless expanse of shifting shadows and infinite chasms, swirling with a dark energy that rippled across the land. Blackened skies, broken stars, and remnants of long-forgotten ruins created an atmosphere of desolation and perpetual twilight. This world existed in perfect harmony with entropy and decay, growing ever more potent with each passing moment.

Creation of the Emissary: The emissary of the seventh clone was forged from the very essence of shadow and destruction. It was a being of pure chaos, imbued with the clone's ability to manipulate entropy and decay. The emissary's power was directly tied to the chaotic nature of the Nocturne Abyss, and it was capable of commanding the Dark Apostles to their fullest potential, drawing upon the deepest powers of destruction.

The emissary’s presence within the inner world allowed it to cultivate an army of shadows and manipulate the very fabric of time and space within its domain. It served as the seventh clone’s right hand, ensuring the Dark Apostles remained loyal and their destructive potential was unleashed when necessary.

The Expanding Influence of the Sixth and Seventh Clones

Through the creation of their inner worlds, both the sixth and seventh clones of Sung Jin-Woo gained a newfound advantage. Time, now working in their favor, allowed them to grow in power at an unprecedented rate. The emissaries, shaped from their own divine essence, acted as extensions of their will, providing them with powerful allies and loyal servants to carry out their commands.

The time dilation in their inner worlds was not just a convenience—it was a strategic advantage, allowing the clones to develop new abilities, perfect their control over their respective realms, and ensure that their forces would never falter. These inner worlds became the epicenter of their influence, where plans were set into motion and new powers were forged in the crucible of divine creation and destructive entropy.

With the addition of the emissaries and the strength gained from their inner worlds, the sixth and seventh clones now stood as pillars of power, ready to continue their mission of maintaining balance in the multiverse, ensuring that the forces of light and darkness would never overpower one another.

The Divine Triad’s grip on the multiverse tightened, as each clone and emissary continued to exert their dominance in their respective domains, preparing for the inevitable battles that lay ahead.